

Call for Papers
University of Arkansas at Little Rock Law Review

The University of Arkansas at Little Rock Law Review is pleased to announce a call for papers for its 2016 Symposium on Legal Hacking: Technology and Innovation in the Legal Profession, to be held on Friday, February 5, 2016.

With the rapid expansion of technology, it is becoming increasingly important for the legal profession to evolve to meet the ever-changing demands of a progressive market, or face being left behind. "Legal hacking" is the development of creative solutions to problems that arise where law and technology intersect. The goal of this legal hacking symposium is to raise awareness of the problems faced by the legal profession and innovative, effective solutions to those problems. On the following day, Saturday, February 6, a legal hacking session for students and practitioners will develop apps to improve the practice of law.

The law review editors encourage all authors who are interested in aspects of this general topic to respond.

The University of Arkansas at Little Rock Law Review will publish articles from the symposium in an issue of volume 38 that is slated for publication in the fall of 2016. Authors should submit an abstract and a cover letter to Kolton Jones, Symposium Editor, at kkjones1@ualr.edu. The deadline for submissions of article proposals is Thursday, October 1, 2015; completed articles will be due at the time of the symposium. Please feel free to email Mr. Jones with any questions.
